It's a question David asked, and even wrote a book about (Being a Philosopher: The History of a Practice, 1992). Not a point that I recall we ever discussed. As a member of the — I won't say 'old', but older guard — David was not altogether happy with current trends in academic philosophy. Davidson was not on his list of.

By "dismissing mental states and processes," Skinner maintains, radical behaviorism "directs attention to the . history of the individual and to the current environment where the real causes of behavior are to be found" (Skinner 1987: 75). This is the overdue replacement of D. W. Hamlyn's somewhat dismissive 1968 translation and commentary of the first two books of Aristotle's De Anima. Hamlyn hardly did justice to this foundational treatise of Aristotle's science of living beings: not only did he mistake it for a treatise on "the" philosophy of mind (then).

HAMLYN. It is probably well known that Schopenhauer maintained that motives are causes seen from within. He meant by that, not merely what many modern philosophers would accept, whether rightly or wrongly —that to explain actions by reference to motives is to explain them by reference to a kind of cause. He meant.

Some late twentieth-century philosophers see philosophy as a discipline in crisis; the end of philosophy and its institutions has been announced and philosophers themselves aim at destroying philosophy.
